FAQ Response

20121113 Cults S01Q06

Question	On Wikipedia, under "Cult (religious practice)" it states in the first few lines "In traditional usage, the cult of a religion, quite apart from its sacred writings ("scriptures"), its theology or myths, or the personal faith of its believers, is the totality of external religious practice and observance, the neglect of which is the definition of impiety. Cult in this primary sense is literally the "care" (Latin cultus) owed to the god and the shrine." Are you setting up a new religion?

Answer

Definitely not! I have no desire to set up a new religion. The main reason I have no desire to set up a new religion is that I believe that almost every religion that's ever been set up on this planet has been the ideas of men and how those men believe God wants to be worshipped. As I've already stated in other questions, I don't believe God needs our worship. God desires our love and a relationship with us and for that reason God does not need our worship. God does not need a religious practice in order to be validated.

I feel quite strongly that there is no need to set up another religion. We need to have every single organisation on this planet come into more harmony with love and that includes every single religious organisation, because there are many religious organisations on this planet that are completely out of harmony with love and completely out of harmony with ethical behaviour towards other people. We need to bring each religion into harmony with love and ethical behaviour.

The golden rule, if you like, that I taught in the 1st century: unless we are willing to treat other people how we would like to be treated, it's really impossible for a religion to have any benefit at all. Now a person can go on practising their religious practice if they want to, but they must come to understand at some point that these practices have all been defined by other people, usually other men, sometimes other women and these particular practices have no bearing on a person's relationship with God. I feel quite strongly that we need to change this and start seeing that love is the thing God is concerned about, not religious practice based around some kind of definition of humanity.
