Answer

Well I believe that every single person on this planet has the potential of having power over another person. You could just say something and cause a change in another person's life. So yes, you do have power over another person's life if they allow that thing to have power over them.

Mary: So then, do you have power over them, or do they give you power over them?

Well it depends: sometimes it's worth giving somebody power to change your life, isn't it? Like, I've read many, many books in my past, and also listened to many, many people in my past through my last two thousand years that have changed my assessment of how things work, and changed my experimentation, my desire to experiment with something different. In a way, they've had a power over my life – I think that's wonderful because it's been a positive effect on my life – but I've chosen, through my free will choice, to take that action. It's different when you force something upon somebody: so what I'm suggesting is that when we choose to force something upon somebody – now we are way out of harmony with the use of our power – the reality is that each of us has a huge amount of personal power. All of us have the personal power to change the world we live in – all of us have that personal amount of power.

It's how we use our power that matters: now if we use our power to attack people, denigrate people, pull them down, destroy them, make them feel worse about themselves, make them feel guilty, to violently abuse them, then we are using our power in a very destructive manner to both them, and ourselves. If we use our power to encourage, up-build, strengthen, give purpose, help people be self-responsible, now we're using our power in a very positive direction to help people in that positive direction of changing themselves and the world around them. That's the way I use my power, that's the way I'd encourage everybody else to use their power.

Unfortunately most people on the planet use their power for a mixture of things: sometimes up-building and encouraging, sometimes destructive and my suggestion is that every time you use your power in a destructive manner there will be pain and suffering for the person who you've used your power against and also for yourselves in the future. My suggestion is to not do that – I've learnt enough about life to not do that myself.
